

We believe that the government is concerned about the people and their well-being. It is also a fact that India is a vast country and may be compared with a cauldron of boiling problems. In formulating their policies, the govt. fails to address many of these problems. Sometimes a solution to one problem aggravates others. This may be due to the truncated views maintained by the existing govt. system. In order to realise our goal of achieving Child Rights we undertake the task of influencing the people in the corridors of power, so that changes in Govt. policies that pose as a hindrance in realising the rights could be brought about.